STAT

I would like to solicit your help in our continuing efforts to improve the quality of CIA analysis on South Asia.

The Agency's Directorate of Intelligence is looking for additional analysts with graduate training in South Asian studies for its Office of Near East/South Asia Analysis. We have openings for men and women interested in contemporary political, economic, social, and military affairs.

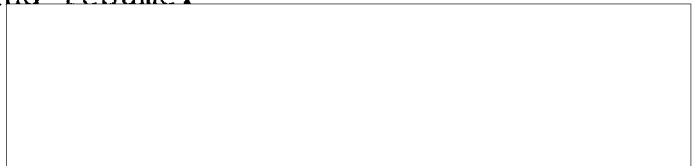

The positions require strong analytical skills and the ability to write straightforward prose and to brief senior officials. US citizenship is a requirement. Applicants must pass medical and rigorous security screenings. The positions are in the Washington, D.C. area. Our analysts are open employees of the CIA.

A graduate degree--or degrees--is highly desirable. Salary is negotiable, with factors such as education, training, work experience, language skills, etc., being taken into account. We normally hire a new Ph.D. with limited teaching experience at the GS-11 level--about $24,508 with this year's cost of living increase.

In addition to looking for new career employees, I also would enjoy talking to faculty members who are interested in learning about our scholar-in-residence program, consultants' panel, or external research opportunities. In these areas we are looking for men and women with good records of research and publication. US citizenship is again a requirement.

Candidates for employment can write directly to me. They should enclose a writing sample and resume.
